Sampurna Hajra, Bsc Economics Hons. Semester-2

COVID-19 or commonly known as the Corona virus is a threat to the entire human race. Putting a challenge to the pride of modern civilization, this deadly virus has stopped the pulse of the whole world. The world is now under a lockdown situation, the streets are empty, no footsteps in the beautiful high-rises - the sign of developments and civilization are everywhere but none to look or enjoy. Fear of death has crippled the movement of entire humanity. The world is desperately in search of medicine for the remedy of this deadly virus and researchers in round the clock are engaged in the discovery of a vaccine. Till now we are fighting this unseen enemy without a proper weapon.

The fight against this corona virus has exposed the big vacuum in public health security in developed as well as in developing country like ours.

The countries are in race to allocate huge budget on defence and military purpose but neglected the area of public health, for which every nation are in a back foot to tackle this pandemic.

The worldwide prolong lockdown has already created a huge negative impact on the economy - every nation is predicting a drastic fall of their GDP. Production is stopped everywhere - millions are jobless- no income. This is the common present scenario of the whole world. Standing at this point, every nation are planning to revive the future economy. Economists are forecasting a recession and policy makers are formulating policies to raise the purchasing power of the common people.

In post COVID-19 scenario, we may sketch the future days as described below:

- A new work culture- Work from home for office work and online classes and examinations for the educational institutions.
- IT sectors will concentrate on their indigenous markets.
- Nations will pay more attention to the public health. Not only to right to food, shelter and education, even the poor and migrant labourers will also get right to health.
- India has a bright chance to take the position by emerging as a self-reliant country which would lead the other developing nations. In the area of pharmaceuticals, India is also in the race to develop a vaccine and if succeed, will play a significant role to save mankind against this virus.
- Wearing masks and use of masks and sanitizer will become a compulsory part of life. People are expected to be more health and hygiene conscious.
- Social distancing will be the rule of life. Accordingly, the public transport system will take a new scheme of operation with limited number of passengers.
- The life during the lockdown period has made people learn a lesson to live with their bare minimum requirements.
- Travel and tourism sector will be very badly affected as people will be in fear of this virus in the coming years and will avoid social mixing and unnecessary travelling.

This is how the post COVID-19 scenario of the world will be.
